It is one of those screensavers which does not even need to be downloaded, yet remains a useful tool throughout the year. is a well-known separation technique used for separating components of a solution or other material based on differences in their respective electrophoretic mobilities. In many instances the differences in electrophoretic mobility are based on differences in electroosmotic mobility. A continuous variation of electroosmotic mobility of a charged particulate as a function of ionic strength or pH was first reported by S. Reich et al. in "Ion-selective Electroosmotic Flow: I. An Electrophoretic Theory and Experimental Demonstration." J. Electroanal. Chem., 58, 249-257 (1978). Electroosmotic flow is a fluid flow resulting from the migration of particulate in an electric field. This results in an increase in fluid flow in a direction toward the electrode to which the most negative charge resides. The electroosmotic mobility of a particulate is dependent upon its surface charge and the local electric field due to the charge surrounding the particulate. Such a local electric field can be enhanced by either applying an electric field across a solution containing a particulate suspension or by introducing a second fluid that has a different electrical conductivity than the first solution and introducing an additional amount of a particulate into the second fluid. There are two types of electroosmotic mobilities, namely, zeta-potential (Z_p) and electrophoretic mobility (E_m) as described by the following equations: $EQU Z_p = 1/4 \cdot \pi \cdot r \cdot \epsilon \cdot \epsilon_0 \cdot \epsilon \cdot \eta \cdot \zeta$. (1) $EQU E_m = z \cdot \text{sub} \cdot p \cdot \text{multidot} \cdot \epsilon \cdot \text{multidot} \cdot z \cdot \text{sub} \cdot s \cdot \text{multidot} \cdot \psi$.
