For a very large table of data, I need to check for every row, if it contains a data that is above a threshold, and store the result in a new table. If there is any, the result should be stored in a new table. I currently use an approach with multiple Threads (can be up to 8), where the Thread reads the data from the table, and then test each row. This works, but I was wondering if there is a more performant approach. Let's assume that I have 10000 rows, and I check the 10000th row for each Thread, there's two options of course: Create a new Thread for each row. Create a new Thread for each row, create some kind of "thread pool" for all Threads, and use Thread.Sleep(1). For the first approach, I do not have to understand the memory management, I can simply create a new Thread. The Thread calls GetOneRow(), which does a GetRow(). If GetRow() reads 1 byte, then it is part of my buffer of 1 byte, if it reads more bytes, then I can get the more data in the next GetRow() call. For the second approach, I have to understand the memory management. I guess, this can be a more performant approach, because no locks or other things. But when I have to create a new Thread to read 10,000 rows, and then have to sleep the Thread for 1 millisecond, then 1cb139a0cd
