Neural correlates of cognitive aging: what is the evidence? Many studies have examined whether and to what extent brain structure changes during cognitive aging. One outcome of these studies has been the broadening of our understanding of the neural correlates of cognitive aging. Rather than focusing on single cognitive abilities, brain imaging studies have examined multiple cognitive domains, and often have included measures of brain structure to address the effect of structural changes on brain-behavior relationships. We argue that results from these studies have yielded conflicting conclusions. Some studies show a decline in cognitive ability with age, and others show no change. These mixed results may reflect differences in the timing, duration, and magnitude of the aging process in the different cognitive domains. We suggest that the use of more than one cognitive ability will yield a better understanding of how neural networks change during the aging process and in older adults.
