The approach is based on the finding that drug-like molecules exhibit a great variety of interactions with DNA. While the traditional binding mode, i.e. groove binding, relies on the fitting of the ligand into a well-defined DNA-binding cleft, significant binding can be also obtained using electrostatic, cation-pi and intercalation interactions with the major grooves of DNA. By this we mean that ligand-induced minor grooves of DNA, located outside the classic Watson-Crick binding site, and particular aqueous pockets of the major groove, can be exploited as potential therapeutic drug targets. We have developed a very sensitive high-throughput method (i.e. polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis, PAGE) for detection of minor groove binding at submicromolar concentrations. We now propose to develop this technology to a practical level of efficiency and to explore its generality and applications to the screening of compound libraries. Our central goal is to identify new classes of minor groove binding compounds. Once this goal is achieved, we intend to develop efficient and sensitive high-throughput technologies for screening libraries as well as for the automated validation of binding candidates. More specifically, we have developed a cellular high-throughput screening (HTS) assay which is based on the principle of sensing the growth inhibition
