Those are my thoughts while I'm waiting for the return of the water that the pipe protecting my house was damaged during the extreme rain and cold this past winter. So I'm forced to go without water for a few days. Thanks Mother Nature. I don't know what's worse -- the water running, which is becoming more and more frequent, or the freezing cold that won't let us go back to our pipes. There's also the frustration of having to live without water when you could be doing far more productive things, like getting ready for the holidays. That's why I had to stay home yesterday. I'm not the only one, you know. The whole neighborhood is affected. For the past few weeks, people have been calling and texting to see if we needed water. It's been a sore point, to say the least. Finally, late last week, City Hall told us they'd stop the water. But first, they had to figure out if the pipes were damaged, or if there was a leak. So we're at the mercy of the water people, the primary provider, to find out what the deal is. Water is supposed to start going back on Saturday. Meanwhile, we try to keep the house warm, while also waiting for the water to come back. Our bathroom is freezing because the water's been off. One of the plumbers came and said it could take two weeks, so I don't know how long it will last. That's the problem with the natural order of things. I had to go without water for a few days last winter, and I won't be forced to this time, but I really hate being in a position where I have to ask for help. The Arrowverse crossover has been getting a lot of attention, but not the best. The November 4 episode of The Flash, titled "The Return of Barry Allen," is getting the most attention, with a lot of it positive. However, that episode also had two other major reveals that were more on the downside. The most obvious one is that two major characters have been erased from the show. Renee Montoya has been reduced to a single line in the episode. The only other moment 3da54e8ca3
