What's new in An Uninvited Guest:

et Radio Service is finally coming to your phones! The FCC is set to vote on February 26th to approve the new technology that could conceivably turn your basic cell phone into a 5G hotspot. Wired reports that the new superfast standard will be made up of smaller "User Equipment" units that connect directly to large towers to deliver gigabit-per-second speeds rather than relying on a cellular network. One of the most fascinating aspects of the service is its enormous speeds. Speeds as fast as 10Gbit/s (a million megabits per second) will have the capacity to connect hundreds of millions of devices at once—enough to upload more than 100 movies to your tablet or smartphones within seconds. AP Photo/Damian Dovarganes, File The technology works like early prototypes of wireless broadband routers. Because the system will have no SENSITIVE CONTENT OF THE UPDATED GUIDELINES BELOW functioning cap on the bandwidth, the speeds are ultimately determined by a limited amount of bandwidth between the base stations and the end user. This shouldn't come as a surprise to anyone who's used mobile data in similar situations. Another unique thing about the new service is it's being built on top of what's called a "third generation" data system instead of the first and second generation technology that are widely used today. The third generation system will only require work on the part of the user to set up the device. Unlike the first generation system, which required radio frequencies to be leased from the carriers, the third generation system will not only work on the cell tower, but on the mobile phone itself. Current users will just connect their primary handset to a new device to get 3G speeds with reduced data transmissions and what's left over being carried on the original device. The FCC explains why this is significant: In the first generation cellular service all the network overhead, such as repeated signal information and control information, resides on the air interface of the narrowband radio signals used for communications between the subscriber and the base station. In the second generation radio system all the network overhead resides in the radio control channel, with the bulk of the data transmission residing in the encoded voice channel. This allows the voice channel to be used with fewer retransmissions due to the receiver knowing the information that was lost during the initial transmission. The 3rd generation wireless communication system will enable the use of smaller and less expensive user equipment devices

[Application of the horizontal segmental epidural technique to the minimally invasive lumbar spinal surgery]. In the epidural hemorrhage, we are required to face the problem of finding the epidural space very accurately. The conventional epidural catheter insertion is often aborted due to an entry error. To avoid that, we developed the horizontal segmental epidural (HSE) technique. The origin and direction of the epidural catheter are almost parallel to the interlaminar space of the lumbar spinal nerves. Most epidural catheters are located at the mid level of the interverte
