The service will include the premium cable networks MTV, VH1, CMT, Logo, BET, BAM, and Nickelodeon; and will include live TV programming from the four sports networks—E! Entertainment, Spike TV, Tennis Channel, and Lifetime. To appeal to millennial viewers and the people living in urban areas, Viacom is launching the service in a single, geographic area, with a focus on sporting events and entertainment. The company is offering a seven-day free trial for Viacom All Access. It's a risky proposition in a market where most cable and satellite providers offer more than 300 channels with ad-free channels and one-time fees of less than $100 per month, but Viacom has been an innovator in the cable space. It's also no coincidence that Viacom made this announcement alongside Viacom All Access. On May 2nd, Viacom CEO Philippe Dauman was appointed to the board of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association. According to Variety, Viacom All Access will include live-streaming and on-demand video content and audio, music, and photo galleries, as well as an interface for interactive features and additional audio and video content from Viacom.
