I have problem with name of my generated qml files that are saved to the:../images folder by default. I want to change it's name but in the process I don't know how to add that name to the filepath generated by qmake command A: Images are just data for the UI, so QtCreator doesn't know whether they are images, texts, etc, so it doesn't generate the folder. You may want to look into the images.path property of your ui_file, which will be set automatically with your images paths if it is not set. The most flexible way would be to take the subdirectory of your images folder to make sure you always get the right images.path. For example: images->img_001.jpg images->img_002.jpg images->img_003.jpg qml->images->img_001.qml qml->images->img_002.qml qml->images->img_003.qml Then you just simply have to put the base directory of your qml into the path of the images.path. images->ui_1.2.zip images->ui_1.3.zip qml->images->ui_1.2.qml qml->images->ui_1.3.qml The easiest way to get the subdirectory name is to use the file manager to explore your folder and highlight the folder which contains your QML files. Then click on the folder and select Folder View > Details. You will then see in the window that the folder name is displayed. Or you might want to consider just providing the

It was then I started to ask myself just how useful Google Maps was for me and I was at a loss as to what other options I had for driving directions. Luckily, I came across a pretty nifty little tool for iOS called Uber Go. Uber Go is a GPS app for iOS which offers driving directions with time estimates that are actually accurate to the minute. (Google Maps can be inaccurate and slow down to a crawl, as you may know.)

Uber Go does not use Google Maps, but their own proprietary mapping system, but their directions are the same as the options you get with Google Maps, which is pretty cool. When I used it for the first time, it was pretty darn accurate and fairly fast. The only negative I found was that directions had a large white line across them which made you have to swipe back and forth to try and ignore it. After a brief go around, the line disappeared, but it was still pretty strange. This is probably something that can be worked out by Uber, but with the simplicity of the app, I was not surprised. If you're someone who is not a fan of your iPad, Uber Go works on Google Maps on Android, as well as iPhones. Download the Uber Go app here.Changing the
