It also offers the first direct evidence that storm track variability plays a major role in causing Atlantic hurricanes to intensify. Data from the U.S. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) from 1993-2005 were used in the study. While hurricane trajectories from 1993-2003 were reconstructed as a result of continuous radar and satellite observations, storms from 2004-2005 were projected using conventional computer models. The new data indicates that some of the major storms that began the 2005 Atlantic hurricane season grew and strengthened to become a Category 5 hurricane after the radars and satellites stopped tracking
