Most of the teachers love to test students on the work done by them. Hence, teachers give constant I am sure the teacher is a very important person in every classroom.s) is serious enough, you should be getting to a doctor for that kind of injury. The other option I'd suggest is to try to treat the pain. It's hard to get any kind of relief with heavy exercise that causes the injury, but simple TENS treatments will usually reduce pain enough to work up to an activity. This is a physical injury and it won't just go away, but you can at least get some relief. Thanks for all the advice. I've had the same injury since i was 18. I'm 28 now. The only thing I've done is seen some physios and referred others too. If the injury doesn't go away after 3 months without doing anything I think I need to go back to physio. I've had a bad ankle for years and just tried to learn to play the fiddle. It's a hard thing to learn to do well, but I'm patient and I've learned to roll back to make it easier to play. But I'm so afraid of making it worse. I can manage to get it to be normal after years of struggling, but I just don't know what to do to try to make it better. Can you suggest some tips? Thanks. it seems like you've had this for a while, could this be age related? I have very strong ankles and i find if i put any weight on them, it's very painful and that being said this is a very little weight. I usually just throw the weight onto my back with my leg up or if im sitting, i prop it up against a book lol I didn't think this was age related until a few days ago when I heard a reference to "my life's work". I thought "I haven't done that yet". But it was years of attempting exercise that finally resulted in this ankle injury. I'm not sure what advice I'd give you because I've never had the injury. But I'm sure you already know that because you've been trying to manage it. It's hard to see a phys

I have a string that contains leading zeros, and I need to remove those. I have tried the below, and it works fine, just not as I expected. I'm trying to remove each of the leading 0's in the string. int main(){ char str = "000004"; printf("%s ",str); printf("%d ",str[0]); str[0] = 0; printf("%s ",str); printf("%d ",str[0]); return 0; } The output I get is: 000004 4 000004 4 Can anyone help me out here? A: Don't use the pointer, it's confusing: int main() { char str[] = "000004"; printf("%d ", str[0]); str[0] = 0; printf("%d ", str[0]); return 0; } A: Are you sure you are not calling your program with ./a.out 0 instead of ./a.out "000004" The confusion comes from the fact that you can use a pointer to a string: char s = "0"; then you can apply the operation you described on the pointer, but with that pointer, it will point to a string literal that will decay to a sequence of characters 0 and that's why it does what you want. But if you call your program with ./a.out "000004" or ./a.out "0", the memory pointed to by s will contain the "000004" string. So now, you can apply the operation you want without any problem, but the thing is that when you want to access a particular element in that string you have to change it again:
