What's new in Fantasy Grounds - Deadly Delves: Along Came A Spider (5E):

A shield wall is a defensive line, a barrier against attacks or projectiles. In the military, it is typically used in defensive works of fortifications as a method of countercharge. In a shield wall, soldiers lay down, with their shields, an effective protective line in front of them. In many cases, the shields are pointed upward, so attackers shooting down from above will miss the soldiers in the charge. This method can be used to blockade a path, hold up an attack, or allow soldiers to maintain better order. Shield walls are common in medieval defenses. In the 17th-century, Swedish army made extensive use of them. Various types of walls used in military history, weapons and topography, meant that it was not possible, or desirable, to have a single type of defensive wall. In the Middle Ages, armies of the time used many different types of barriers to protect and defend a castle or fortress. For example, a castle could use a stone wall to protect the main gate, keep on a defensive rampart, use towers to protect the flanks, and use the wooded terrain to its advantage. By the late 16th century most castles in Germany, France and Sweden had regular systems of earthen walls, or man-made barriers in valleys and similar areas, which were defended by hundreds of men. These types of wall systems were effective protection for their systems because they could focus most of their manpower and numbers within the wall. While it's not always desirable to defend a wall, it has a major advantage in attacking the wall. By attacking a wall, or defending a siege, the defenders must invest valuable resources holding the wall and it is hard to withdraw the wall after the attack without following the attackers, as a countercharge would be massacred. This led to the famous "Berlin Wall" and similar innovations. As effective as the individual defenses were, as the wall became highly developed it fell to disastrous defeat during the Berlin Operation in 1806. In his report of the battle, Gebhard Leberecht von Blücher stated that the state of the defenses meant they were completely unprepared for the devastating attack by Napoleon Bonaparte. He concluded, "... As regards the defence, my opinion is that this place may be summed up as: not prepared, not of good quality, and not surrounded by bad territory." It cost 300,000 lives and millions of men spent after the battle trying to bring the retreating Russian army
