Olfactory responses to waterborne cues were investigated in four marine hydromedusan species, two of which are commonly encountered during spawning and hatching on sand and silt. A single olfactory receptor neuron (ORN) in the sensory tentacles of these species was found to be sensitive to both the odor of a non-volatile egg yolk steroid and waterborne carbon dioxide (CO<sub>2</sub>). These responses are consistent with those previously described for hydromedusans, although the strength of response to CO<sub>2</sub> was less in our specimens. The binding spectrum of the ORN receptor was broader than that previously described, extending to more volatile odors such as dimethyl disulfide (DMDS). This receptor responded to DMDS in a broader concentration range than previously described. The responses to male odorants may also have been observed, but these data must await future investigation. The behavioral responses of the brooding hydromedusans Aplysia dactylomela and Partula stagnalis to the waterborne cues were investigated in bioassays using bilaterally perfused electro-olfactorographs (EOG). In addition, the behavioral responses to the odor of a dead, molting male P. stagnalis were investigated to test the hypothesis that this cue may be important for selection of male partners in the successful establishment of parthenogenetic progeny. Behavioral responses were limited to a relatively restricted time of the assay. The time courses of behavioral responses were quite variable, and the magnitude of response was generally low. The response to CO<sub>2</sub> was variable and a necessary part of more general behavioral responses, suggesting that the response to CO<sub>2</sub> may be closely related to general behavior. DMDS and DMDS-like compounds elicited clear c6a93da74d
