That doesn't mean we don't eat them. It's not immediately obvious to me why, say, bread is "digestible" whereas, say, oranges are "not". Why does bread digest? What properties of bread make it digestible? The word "digestible" is derived from the word "digest" - that is, a food is digestible if it can be broken down into small components which can be consumed. Bread is made of many different things, some of which are not digestible. But bread is also made of some things which are digested (wheat, for example) - so it must be that some component of it is digestible. It seems to me that this is a not-insignificant property of foods - one of the components of a food must be digestible in
