Sisi Online UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. — After decades of using rudimentary methods, a group of researchers from Penn State has developed an inexpensive, automated system to catch bed bugs, the small blood-sucking parasites that live in homes and buildings. The device has the potential to save human and animal lives and dramatically cut the incidence of bed bug infestations. “This is the first automated bed bug trap and it was a huge challenge to develop,” said Jeanette Fontenot, a senior research scientist in entomology at Penn State who led the team that developed the device. “We’ve spent more than a decade designing, testing and refining it. This new, automated device is a major breakthrough for catching and studying bed bugs.” The automated system traps live bed bugs in 10-millimeter-wide tubes. The team uses a new method that increases their likelihood of being caught and allows researchers to track a bed bug’s progress through the trap and kill it more quickly when it is not in an active feeding state. The researchers found that when they put several traps in an infested room, they collected bed bugs in about half of them. And when they set up traps on a weekly basis, they found bed bugs had a 50 percent success rate catching and killing them. The trap system eliminates the need for a trained technician to manually place traps, which makes it more convenient for field studies. The team is sharing the system with researchers around the world, who are investigating ways to control the bed bug population and improve human health. To catch bed bugs, the researchers needed a way to force the bugs to walk through a trap. After numerous attempts, the team found that cutting the corners of the tubes on a slanted, angled board, with wires attached, was the most effective way to force the bugs to walk through the trap. ❖
