Edwin Lloyd was arrested after he sold a Ruger Mini 14.223 caliber rifle to a man who had been convicted of possession of a stolen firearm in February 2019, according to an FBI news release. ADVERTISEMENT A paperwork error resulted in the mistaken transfer of the Ruger to the convicted felon, according to the release. When Lloyd contacted the supposed buyer, who was a man called "A.K.," to make sure that "A.K." was a real person, Lloyd said that A.K. had previously sent a photo of a stolen firearm to his phone. He then informed the buyer that he was cancelling the sale, but, not before making a copy of the handwritten receipt. He told investigators that, when he received a call from a registered nurse at the buyer's home, he was initially confused because the phone number listed on the receipt was that of the hospital where Lloyd had been treated in December, according to the release. When he was later told that the number belonged to the buyer, Lloyd realized his mistake and closed the sale. The gun shop owner told investigators that he has sold thousands of dollars worth of firearms to "A.K." I tried to build a GUI app with Python and Kivy on Windows. To do so, I followed Kivy's documentation. But for most documentation, there are also very helpful examples. Unfortunately, the examples for Windows are not very clear, and I found myself wondering what the underlying mechanism of Kivy is. According to Kivy's documentation, the relationship between Kivy and Qt can be summarized in this way: Kivy widgets are well-known Qt widgets that have been ported into Python; Kivy applications share the same runtime as other Python applications; Kivy applications are composed and run as normal Python applications. So I guess the relationship between Kivy and QT could be summarized as follows 79a2804d6b
