Photoshop's history dates back to version 1.0 in 1991, while other photo editing software competitors didn't gain widespread popularity until much later. With the iPhone XS and iPhone XS Max set to arrive this month, Apple's iOS 13 operating system includes the Adoptive Support Array — a previously unreported feature that helps add support for over-the-air cellular networks on Apple's new iPhone handsets. The feature allows for far more stable connections for iPhone users, and Apple appears to be ramping up its wireless network coverage around the globe as a result. Not a bad example of what this means in the real world: the kind of shaky video that can make you cringe or even go blind. Thankfully, iOS 13's Adaptive Screen Time feature promises to make the experience far less traumatic by automatically making videos and media more digestible. Apple has added HomeKit Accessory Watch to reach a wider population of consumers who may not be interested in a smart home, but might like to make a few of their existing gadgets a bit smarter. The accessory works by letting owners turn compatible home hubs, lights, fans, and other gadgets on and off with a glance from their wrist. HomeKit Accessory Watch is just another example of what Apple's actually planning in adding smart-home functionality to iOS 13.

Through Share for Review and DLA, Photoshop enables a completely redesigned workflow that lets users easily collaborate on their projects, both within and across platforms, while using it as their regular desktop app. Photoshop can load and save content from the file system, the cloud, and even the web in a PDF or a.webarchive file. Using Share for Review, users can now work in Photoshop either remotely or on the same installation used for editing, all without leaving Photoshop. All content is synced with well as the latest changes, as long as the content is either text or an image. For example, if users are working together remotely on a large gradient, each participant can create a draft of the gradient and then all can simultaneously provide feedback with comments and suggestions. Once the work is completed, the collaborators can save their Share for Review files locally or back on the website. And a link to the file can be sent back to the original user. Once everyone agrees that the gradient is ready to share, all can take one action to have it shared. When using Share for Review in Photoshop, users can either act on their own by editing and saving the files on their computers, or they can have work reviewed by others. Using the display editing features or the Document Modes tool, the assigned reviewer can review every change that was made and even make new changes in their own space while the content is open in the same view area. For example, the reviewer could make a change to a gradient the first user made. Regardless of who's working, the changes will be synced across in the same version, so if one changes it, the others will see it in real time. This is not a retrograde step; it's a new way of working.
