The update allows you to preview 100% of your image, while you are working on it, as well as having a full license to save up the file as you work on it. A new Publisher feature, the now iOS native, Adobe Rush, make part of this update as well. This update really gives us a chance to breathe, we can now say that Photoshop CC has been a priority since it released the preview, and it kept to it's word. There were no major changes, and if anything it was a reset for the application we get with it. The application is not flexible enough for professional photographers. It lacks the ability to duplicate the frame in the user interface. This update adds a simple but appreciated improvement in the way it handles layer view. It turns out that it lets you zoom in on a layer much better than before. The upgrade also gives you the option to sort layers by name or layer order. Check out the Compression choices available in the "Save for Web" dialog box, which appear to allow a number of different compression types. It is possible that Quick Fix Auto may be able to handle these formats. After all, it does have a Contract for Better Support for Layers feature. One thing that may prove to be very beneficial in the application is the Learning Mode, this is the ability to preview, modify and save your work with no modifying as you school your behavior. Photo Basics > Optimize Images > JPEG Optimize is an important tool for creating JPEG images that are optimized for web display, which can reduce file size by up to 20%. This minilab also enables you to scale images and apply sharpening and noise reduction to reduce the file size of images. This tool also does not affect the compression ratio of the image and does not degrade image quality.
